

One Morning I Watched...

a brown-skinned man take a white twenty gallon pail from his landscaping truck, fill it with water,
and haul it fifty meters to a newly planted shrub.
Unhurried,
he built a berm of soil, so that not a drop
would miss the mark—
the thirsty roots
of this tender life.

His gentle pouring was paced
to the shrub's capacity to drink, slow and patient.

He stood with the emptied pail and watched, monk-like, the soaking of soil.

This was no job.

This was a practice,
a love affair,
blurring the line between giver and receiver.

I imagined
our Earth community receiving a love like his—to see what is before our eyes, and cherish what every being can become by the nourishment of reverence poured out upon the lives that are ours to tend.

He was not finished.

He turned his unwavering attention to two other fortunate shrubs.

(I thought I heard them singing at his approach.)

Beads of sweat now mixing with water, the greening ones
now trust
this daily labour of love, this consistent attunement.

They've learned the pleasure of anticipating with each approaching dawn, the arrival of this salty love and shamelessly nurse.

The good folk of this gated community walk past the Mexican every day, not realizing that the gracious One has sent them a guide to lead them home to an unprotected life of devotion.
